

Heritage overhead

The sky must be the limit in stupidity now that the National Trust of NSW wants to heritage-list the sky above NSW (and no, I'm not kidding).

If successful, it will be another ridiculous abuse of the Heritage Act, which is in need of reform.

Art deco buildings like St George Tavern (Leader, April 1) don't have much (if any) aesthetic, historic, social or scientific significance and should not be listed, unless the owners and community agree.

Heaven help us if the Heritage Act isn't made fairer by Minister Sartor, as the sky may well fall in on besieged property owners, while genuine heritage conservations are jeopardised.

Sadly, common sense is so often sacrificed by ridiculous extreme-green minorities, on a sacred mission to return suburbia to the 19th century.
